At the end of the novel, Crusoe returns to Europe, where he receives a lot of money from his sugar plantations. He then married, had children, and eventually returned to his island. The novel ends with the following note: All of this, with some very surprising incidents in some of my own new adventures, in ten more years, I may probably have given a father account later. The last line of the novel, then, is a promise of continuing adventure, and indeed, Defoe delivered just that when he wrote The Farther Adventures by Robinson Crusoe the same year.
